the border. Sharing a continent and similarities of culture and history with the behemoth, when the United States stirs, Canadians are affected. The heft of the United States is no less when it comes to academic scholarship. In Canada, the main difference from the US case is that EJ claims have less to do with individual or community rights but are linked, in large part, to the fear of large segments of the population that the system of justice represented by public service delivery across this vast land may be threatened.
